THE SOVIET UNION now is turning out more scientists and technicians than the U. S., according to Allen W. Dulles, Director of the Central Intelligence Agency. While the U. S. is ahead of Russia in scientific manpower today, there is danger that the Soviets will pull ahead by 1960, he warned.

General Robert R. Taylor, who is in charge of the U. S. military intelligence program, said that the Soviet scientists are "the top men of the West, the intelligence chief said. "Military needs dominate their research program. We who are in intelligence work have learned by now that it is safe to assume that the Soviets do not have the basic skill, both theoretical and technical, to do in these fields what we can do."

American intelligence experts have been surprised at times, Mr. Dulles said, by Russia's progress, especially in the aviation, electronics and nuclear fields.
